Course Description

This interactive course explores how STD/HIV programs can be integrated into larger community-identified priorities in promoting health. The course provides a critical look at "community-owned" programs vs. "community-placed" programs; the conceptual and applied differences between community organization and community development; skills and strategies to link community – identified issues to funding priorities; and an overview of how community mobilization strategies affect sustainability.

After completing this course you will be able to:

- Identify a continuum model of community practice;
- Distinguish between community and priority population.
- Identify factors that affect level of community participation.
- Determine how program planning and implementation strategies affect program sustainability;
- Develop skills to link health programs to community identified issues.
- Define health professional's role and skills needed to effectively work with communities.

Who Should Attend?

- Prevention and education staff who have direct responsibility for planning and evaluating HIV or STD prevention programs in community settings
- Individuals who work to build collaborations and coalitions between agencies, programs, individuals and communities.
